In an interview, Joan Miró once said the following about his sources of inspiration: "In my pictures, there are tiny forms in huge, empty spaces. Empty spaces, empty horizons, empty planes - everything that is reduced has always impressed me very much."

This aquatint etching is from the series of works of the same name that the painter and graphic artist produced in 1967. In English, the title means "Trace on the Wall" and thus symbolically stands for the preceding statement and the processual working method of the Spanish-Catalan artist.
